SATURDAY GAZETTE, BLOOMFIELD AND MONTCLAIR.

AN INDEPENDENT WEEKLY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE,
EDUCATION,
POLITICS,
GENERAL NEWS,
AND LOCAL INTERESTS.

It is generally acknowledged to be the equal of the best newspapers published, and superior to most country papers. It is a matter of pride to these towns which it so ably and well represents.

To sustain these assertions, it would be easy to give a large selection from opinions of its readers and patrons which constantly come to hand. But the paper will speak for itself.

Subscription price, $2 a year or $1 for six months.

The Discarded Daughter.

BY NETTIE MARVINE.

Please give me a piece of bread, mother, and a little boy of five summers raised his large blue eyes so mournfully to his mother's face, that a harder heart than hers could not have withstood the gentle entreaty; so slowly rising she took from the cupboard a small loaf, and cutting a slice handed it to the child. The room, situated in the garret of a miserable dwelling in one of Atlantic cities, though scrupulously neat, was yet destitute of almost every comfort. A wretched apology for a bed stood in one corner, a few old stools did duty as chairs, and a table upon which a dim candle flickered and glared, completed the furniture.

Edith Clare was an only daughter. At the early age of four her mother left her to dwell with the angels; and Wendell Clare, turning away from the grave, which held the loved one of his heart, took his little daughter, far too young to comprehend her loss, and retired to an elegant country-house on the banks of the Hudson. Here, the mistress, and failing much her knees, and pride of an indulgent father, in possession of every luxury, surrounded by attendants, who anticipated the slightest wish, Edith had attained to eighteen years.

"Willful girl! it is thus you repay the love and affection lavished upon you! it is thus I am rewarded for these many years, during which I have spared no pains to make you happy and, and have left no wish ungratified!"

"Father you have my answer. I love Herbert Lee. I will marry no other; and though the voice was tremulous, yet the countenance, pale as marble, expressed naught but firm resolve.

"Then go and the curse of an injured father rest upon you."

"Say, father, curse me not," exclaimed the maiden, and, failing much her knees, she threw her arms about him; but tearing himself away, he hastily quitted the apartment.

Wendell Clare was proud. Was not the purest blood running in his veins? Was not his Mary, his buried Mary, from one of the noble families of old England? And none but him of high birth and honorable connections should ever wed his daughter Edith. So he had vowed; and when Herbert Lee, a young artist of much promise, but poor, and of whose family no more could be said save that they were honest and useful citizens, petitioned respectfully, yet earnestly, for that fair hand, his indignation knew no bounds, and in language keenly felt by the young man, dismissed him from his presence. Immediately seeking his daughter, the conversation which he had recounted, and much more, took place, and that night Edith Clare, leaving the paternal mansion, gave her hand with her heart in it to Herbert Lee. Then did the father resolve that never should he look upon his daughter's face again. For three years did Herbert Lee and his youthful bride dwell in the city they had selected as their residence; and their home, though a humble one, yet a happy one, save when the thought of her father, now declining in years, and from whom they had received no communication, would cause the eyes of Edith to fill with tears. And Mr. Clare was not happy. Deeply did he love "his Edith," and he mourned her as one dead. Many times did he long to call her back to be again the light of his home; but his proud heart refused. No, the fiat of Wendell Clare had gone forth, and he would not be recalled; and when one day a letter, in a dainty white envelope, bearing the well known hand writing, was brought him, fearing lest his resolution should fail him should he read it, and he should recall his lost child to his arms, it was returned unopened.

During these years Herbert Lee toiled with unremitting zeal to acquire a support for Edith and the little cherub that had been added to their household—told too hard, and his strong arm, now for months he languished, and the watchful care, the constant attentions, the tears and prayers of Edith were unavailing. When did human love ever move the king of terrors? The day of parting came at last.

"My poor Edith," murmured he, "forgive me if I wronged you. God knows I loved you. Return to your father, he will receive you now. God—bless—you, Edith!"

And all was over.

She stood with her fatherless boy by the hand beside an open grave. The man of God had taken his place at the head. The solemn stillness of the air was only broken by his clear, full tones, as he repeated those beautiful words: "I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live again." Then the last fond look was taken; the coffin was slowly lowered into the grave, and the heavy clods were thrown upon it. Dast had returned to dust; earth was again mingling with its mother earth. She turned away and entered her home, now desolate.

"Alone," she sighed, "all alone in this dreary world."

"No, mamma," said a little bird-like voice, "not alone, for I am here," and two little arms were thrown about her neck, and a little golden head nestled in her bosom. And Edith felt that she had all something to live for. At first she thought of returning immediately to her father, but it was a great distance, and the long illness of Herbert had left her purse—never very full—almost empty. Something must be done immediately. She gave up the house she had been occupying, and reserving a little furniture, took the room in which we found her at the commencement of our sketch. She had endeavored to earn a livelihood by sewing, and night after night, while others slept, she plied her needle; but the proverbial low wages of the needle-women of our large cities proved scarcely sufficient to meet her necessary expenses. Sorrow and suffering had borne almost to the earth that fragile form, and but few would recognize in the wan and wasted features of Mrs. Lee, the poor seamstress, the once gay and beautiful Edith Clare.

On the evening of which we write, she had sat silently for more than half an hour, and had at length, with her trembling lip, and memory reverted to days gone by. Again she looked upon her mother, as she left her last kiss upon the baby lips of her darling Edith—her mother, cold and still, the green turf resting upon her bosom, herself the light of her father's home—her utter loneliness and desolation now: when suddenly a silvery voice disturbed her musings, with,

"Please give me a piece of bread, mother."
